

To whom it may concern:

It is my understanding that the FCC is considering implementing a national standard regarding telephone privacy and unsolicited telemarketing. While this is admirable and beneficial for those individuals not covered by a state standard, the residents of Indiana, myself included, have been well served by the recently enacted Indiana Telephone Privacy law. We have finally been able to enjoy the privacy of our own homes with out the annoying interruptions of unwanted telephone calls by solicitors. To enact a national standard that would lessen the effects of the state statute would be a disservice to all the residents of Indiana and any other state that has taken the initiative to legislate controls for the telemarketing industry. Please reconsider any national regulation that would once again allow disruption the peace that the residents of Indiana are currently experiencing in the privacy of their homes. I welcome the opportunity to give further input on this proposed measure.

Sincerely,
